Ode to the Moon.

Fair, lonely meen !- then speakest not. Yet then art elequent to me—
Oh! that the scenes could be forget.
Which have been witnessed of by thee!
But, no, reosembrance well not part
With what it once too dearly prized:—
The beam cantist case to smart,
What feeling layer

Whose feelings have been sacrificed. Years have gone past, since these diess wer,

My buson's too expectant flunc;
Changes and griof have advered inc.
But thou art smiling still the saint.
A little longer I must brave
Life's gloome cares, and deep reputing;
Then thou will shine open my grave,
As placed as thou now art shining

O ! levely moon !-since, young and bright, Thou first didst start thy lonely way,

Millions have gazed upon thy light.

But they are gone '—and where are they?

O where are they who oft of yore. Lifted the astronomic eye.
Thy hidden my steries to explore.
And trace the trackless Deity) O! where are they, who from the height

O.! where are they, who from the height Of Habel's beas en-aspiring tower, Perused thy soft and pensive light, Through many a contemplative hoor? Or they, of astrologic love, Who wandered off heneath thy beams, B.C. Tygris' or Emphricas' shore, In speculation's misty dreams?

(For thou didet light their eptended halfs:) Who reveled life a bright hour away.

In Balley a or in Tadmer a sails
Or they, who in ambition a might Piled the hour pyramids, to stand
I'm ages moundering means its light-or ages mouldering nearly the light-Vet anote their names on Lethean sand O't where are they, whose assort's gleson. All sollies as they lay at state. Playbod back thy melanched, beam,

Who saw her glory, or her wane, And deemed not time should ear unfold Such glory and such power spain.

Where are the toyriads who have crept From the rade day's offensive glare, And poured their grief to ther, and vept.

And wished that life were ended there?

They are not, and no more shall be. Hut then, fair moon, endinessed by time, Still floatest on thine artire ara.

And shedst thy light on every clime.

Then gleanest in the Arabis eye-Chierest the Hindan with thy ray-Englished the Indian's western sky. And rade Sibesian's involv way.
On Volga's and on Gambia's shore—
By Plata's broad, majestic stiram.

And where Ningara a waters rout. They pour'st thy soft, necturnal beam Mild, pensive moon than art to me,

Even 's religion's holy light—
Dim gleaming from eternity.
Through nature's dark and devery night.
And as thou off art lost in though.
While journeying thro' heaven's vanited sumple E'en thus, the gloses of doubt enchange.
The trembling light of faith and hope.

O! I have gazed through many an hour-

D' I have gazed through many an hour—
Through many a long—long night on thee,
And I have felt thy snothing power
Come kindly o'er my inters
O'! I have gazed—and I have thought
How many a heart-loved scene had fied,
How many a hope was turned to mought,
How many a juy and comfort dead!

Off I have gured with tearful eyes—
And thought the time would color, v
Should lay my lonely head, where lies
The dust of those of years gone by.

And there in stience he forgot. When some swift years had enward swept And their shouldst smile upon the spe Where I and all my sorrows slept;

And far-far fature years should come, And many generations spring.
And call this dreary world their home.
And feel, as I have felt, the string
Of sorrow's desolating blight.
